AVIATION QUESTION OF THE MONTH

Answer to last month's question: You're cruising along at 4,500 feet msl on a sunny day. While receiving radar service and monitoring the moving map on your tablet, you notice you are approaching an alert area but have not received clearance to enter. Can you proceed?

According to AOPA and the FAA: Yes. Alert areas indicate areas of a high volume of flight training or unusual aerial activity, but a clearance to enter is not required. (Source: Pilot's Handbook of Aeronautical Knowledge, 14-4.)

This Month's Question: You've decided that it might be fun to start giving flight instruction on the weekends. You've already got a private pilot certificate with an instrument rating and about 300 hours, including a couple training for your commercial certificate. You currently have a first class medical, with third class privileges. Are you required to obtain a new first or second class medical to pursue further certificates and a second career as a flight instructor?

SHORT FINAL

AVweb December 10, 2012

Heard at Orlando Executive:

Tower: "Ercoupe 1234, we have a blimp landing to the right of runway 7. Reduce speed."

Ercoupe: "1234 reducing speed."

Tower: "1234, make a half-'S' turn to the left."

Ercoupe: "1234 making a half-assed turn to the left."
